A new technology is about to be implemented for travelers entering the planet Mars. Previously, humans arriving on Mars went through the immigration and security process and were interviewed in person by Martians. But increasing access to space travel, with more and more people want to take vacations on Mars or even to move there, has raised the workload at immigration. The Martians need to control their borders because they don't want everybody arriving on their planet. To solve this problem, the government on Mars are considering implementing a facial recognition technology to speed up traveler identification. The system uses facial recognition software to identify who you are and to check if you have a criminal record. It has been training using with Martian' faces which are similar to human faces, but there are differences. Martian eyes are bigger, the skin color is red, and the forehead has more wrinkles. The system is 92% accurate in recognizing Martian Faces (for every 100 travelers, the system correctly identifies and misidentifies 8). But the different facial features of humans mean that it is only 79% accurate with human faces.
